[Note: All characters except Hal have been deliberately omitted for brevity and clarity.] The call from Walter Cronkite should have been a pleasant one. As most of the world's press watched the taping of The Green Lantern/Green Arrow Show, the revered newsman asked the two heroes to sign a few autographs. Since their roles were so closely intertwined, the signing would be spread over two appearances. Cronkite first invited the Flash to pose for pictures while Green Arrow remained seated. But when Green Arrow approached the podium, he insisted on taking the autographs. The two men remained huddled over the table. But as the newsman turned away, he spied a TV cameraman standing nearby. A cameraman's work is never done. Cronkite snatched up the camera, shot the Flash, then turned to Green Arrow with a knowing expression. "Oh no, Mr. Cronkite!" Green Arrow exclaimed. "You can't do that! He's my guest!" While this particular quip was never aired, it is perhaps among the clearest pictures we have of the Green Lantern/Green Arrow character dynamic. The producers chose to gloss over it, but this is a role model's version of the infamous "real men don't cry" episode from the classic 1970s sitcom Mork & Mindy. The Lantern/Arrow relationship is not nearly as well-documented as other superheroes, and it's difficult to sift through what we do know. Some of it is the series' own fault. Though loosely based on the popular Green Lantern comic books, this new series was conceived by writer-artist Barry Morrow and co-writer Chuck Dixon to showcase their feature film, Batman Beyond: Return of the Joker. It's certainly possible this influenced the storyline, which featured the villain reappearing in the present to wreak havoc. Yet the story also had a different kind of logic: the comics are a staple of the DC Universe, while The Green Lantern/Green Arrow Show was hardly known outside of fans. The show first aired in 2002, and it was surprisingly popular. During the cartoon's first season, only the CW network canceled it after only eight episodes. But the ratings went up each year. With a solid base, WB gave the show a full-time series, and ended its 82157476af
